In the case of a single internal combustion engine, the fuel supply is carried out using a fuel pump, which is a component part, and the engine is driven by a crankshaft, which is another component part. The present invention relates to the structure of a vehicle, in which the crankshaft and the fuel pump are located in a space, in other words, are disposed in a crankcase, and are linked together so as to turn integrally. In an ordinary vehicle, the fuel pump and the crankshaft are supported on the crankcase so as to turn integrally, and a lubricant is stored in the crankcase so as to suppress the friction during the rotation. However, a difficulty arises in filling the lubricant into the crankcase depending on the structure of the engine. Accordingly, with the view of filling the lubricant into the crankcase, there has been provided a crankcase structure in which a lubricant injection hole for injecting the lubricant into the crankcase is formed in a head cover to which an end of the crankshaft is fastened so as to extend toward the crankcase and is coated with a lubricant (see, for example, Japanese Patent Application Laid-open No. Hei 10-251172). In such a crankcase structure, if the vehicle is stored in a warehouse, the head cover is covered with a vehicle body (car-body) cover, and the lubricant is injected from the injection hole in the head cover into the crankcase. If the vehicle is used as a work car, then the vehicle body (car-body) cover is covered with a sheet-metal cover, and the lubricant is injected from the injection hole in the sheet-metal cover into the crankcase. However, according to the aforesaid crankcase structure,
